Dear Class of 1999,

Welcome to Johns Hopkins! I write to you as the Director of The Johns Hopkins University Writing Center, a new resource for Hopkins undergraduates that will open in October of this year. For those of you unfamiliar with the form and function of writing centers, they are places where students can either drop in or make an appointment to receive assistance with their writing. Whether you are having problems moving from an outline to a working draft or you feel that the draft that you have produced could use another, intelligent perspective, I urge you to visit the Center. There, you will be met by a sympathetic and highly-trained Consultant — either a fellow undergraduate or a graduate student whose job is to listen to your expectations of and frustrations with your text and to ask questions that will move you toward a better understanding of what you want and need to write.

The Center is thus not a place to "fix" papers. Consultants will be happy to point out grammatical errors within context of a larger discussion about the text — for example, noting recurrent comma splices during a discussion about the organizational strengths and weaknesses of your essay. But they do not provide "Proofreading-While-U-Wait," for this would not finally teach you much about writing.

I want to emphasize that the Center is for all writers who feel they could use assistance; across the country, many of those who come to writing centers are accomplished writers who know that their work could always stand improvement.

Operating under the auspices of the English Department, the establishment of the Center has been the joint effort of undergraduate and graduate students, faculty, staff, and administrators. It is housed in the Little Theatre, on the 2nd floor of Levering Hall (turn left at the Union Desk and ascend the staircase). It will be open from 7-10 p.m. Sunday-Thursday. As both a Consultant and the Director, I hope to see you there. To make an appointment or ask a question, please call the number above or see our homepage of JHUniverse.

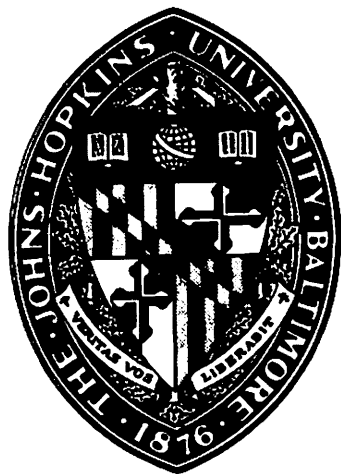

Sincerely,

Steve Newman
